Peace Corps Response

Advice from the Inside: Tips on How to Get a Job

By Vivian Nguyen, Third Goal/Peace Corps Week
Program Specialist (RPCV Niger, 2003-2005)

Reprinted from Hotline, September 1, 2008

Whether you very recently returned to the U.S. and are dealing with “reverse” culture shock or COSed awhile ago and are just exploring career options, you’ll want to take advantage of the upcoming RPCV career conference sponsored by Peace Corps’ Returned Volunteer Services. Events like this one are designed as an extension of your COS conference, and are a great way to network with people in your career field of interest, as well as to get useful tips on the “nitty gritty” of the job search. Registration is now open for the next conference, February 9-12, in Washington, DC.

Since I began my job with Peace Corps in 2006, I’ve been in the position to hire assistants who work with me to implement the Peace Corps Week program. I’ve learned a great deal about what employers look for when hiring. And let me tell you: there are a lot of fish in the sea with the required job experience and technical skills, but not all of them have the necessary soft skills, and not all of them can represent themselves well in their résumés or cover letters. Certainly some of them are so nervous during interviews that they blow it for themselves.

I’ve interviewed about a dozen RPCVs seeking a foot in the door at Peace Corps. Many of them are ill-prepared: they aren’t professional enough, haven’t researched enough about the position, or answer so vaguely that I don’t know what they have to offer to the position they are seeking. When you’ve just come back from Peace Corps service, you are not fully integrated into the fast-paced, highly demanding, and high-quality expectations of the U.S. job market. New returnees have a difficult time competing with RPCVs who have been back awhile (or non-RPCVs who know the way it is when you are job seeking) and have put in a major effort to get a job.

At an RPCV career conference, you will learn a great deal about how to carry yourself and how to correctly “sell” yourself in this tough job market. You will learn how to translate your Peace Corps experiences into a lexicon that is understandable to employers. You will hear from people of different agencies, organizations, and companies who will tell you what they are looking for, what mistakes applicants most often make, and what the process is for applying. You will also learn how to network, how to ask for informational interviews, how to sell yourself verbally to people in your network, what key techniques you should use in your resume and cover letters, and how to avoid common pitfalls. Washington, DC, especially, is an extremely competitive town: everyone is qualified, and many are over-qualified. You have to know how to set yourself above those who don’t know the tricks.

Another advantage of attending these events is that you have the opportunity to network with Peace Corps staff and other employment recruiters. This is your chance to ask questions and get direct answers, get your face seen, get people's contact information, and definitely see how these people carry themselves. How do they act? How do they dress? How do they speak? All of these things are reflective of their organizational or corporate culture. What kind of professionalism do they radiate, and how will you make sure you can radiate that same or similar professionalism to be noticed in a sea of applicants?

So much effort has been put into creating these career conferences to support us, the RPCVs. Many other professional organizations charge their clients to attend similar career events, while the Peace Corps is providing it for free to our RPCV community. These events aren't just career fairs, they are opportunities to learn important tactics to launch yourself in an intelligent and competitive way in the job market.

Editor's note: The next RPCV Career Conference is scheduled for February 9-12. For more information, be sure to visit www.peacecorps.gov/rpcv/events (updated regularly) or email rvsevents@peacecorps.gov.
